How political should Christianity become?

The churches

BY OUR CORRESPONDENT

FATHER Anthony Mulvey, the Strabane parish priest who stepped into the H-blocks controversy in a decisive manner this week, was later attacked by the local organisers of the campaign to win for the prisoners political status.

If he wants to mix in politics, they said in effect, let him get up on a political platform and do it and face the opposition. The Rev. Ian Paisley, they added, at least did carry on his political activities in the political arena.

The organisers of the Strabane march were clearly rather annoyed that Father Mulvey, after so pointedly dissociating himself from their objective, then declined to engage in further controversy face to face.

The dilemma he now finds himself in is the same one confronting any clergyman who takes a public stand on a political issue. How far does he go? If he persists, is there a danger that he might be taken over by a party and become a party man?

Christianity is now a very political religion in a sense it was not a generation ago. True, in the 1930s and 1940s there were the Christian socialists like William Temple and George Bell.

Latterly we have had Donald Soper, Mervyn Stockwood, Philip Potter and Donald Lamont — and the last two names provide an important clue to the change: for it is on the former mission fields abroad — what we now call the Third World — that the big change has occurred.

There the church has increasingly espoused the cause of the coloured underdog and, in so doing, its missionary arm has tended to take a leftward lurch. This, in turn, has led to internal political conflict at home.

The rightist reaction has been inspired: we are very familiar with it in Northern Ireland, where it has focused on the campaign against the World Council of Churches, most notably within the Presbyterian Church.

But is this an unavoidable confrontation?

The answer to that question depends on what sort of a church you want. Today the cry is for relevance: the gospel must provide a credo which can be applied to today's needs and challenges, political, social, economic.

Should one hold shares in companies with operations in South Africa? Should one use alcohol? And what about gambling? Is not it grounded in the anti-Christian instinct of greed?

□□

Today we expect to be given the answer even if they tend to be divisive in their effect. But there is a contrary view: it was eloquently put two years ago by Edward Norman, the Dean of Peterhouse in Cambridge, in his BBC Reith Lectures.

He argued that Christianity was destroying by becoming too secular, by being defined too much in political and social terms. The gospel, he said, was now too much concerned with social rights and wrongs, too little with immortality and the spiritual idea of eternal life.

□□

The result was that the churches and churchmen were in danger of being swallowed up in secular debates whose terms and limits were set by others: debates on racialism, economic exploitation, class division, human rights and the rest.

Dr. Norman clearly has something here — as the full text of his lectures shows. But is the ideal not a matter of finding the correct balance rather than one of making a choice between extremes?

If the gospel were to cease to speak its mind on the application of the gospel to the detail of the life we live, no doubt it might become in one sense more popular — but also more withdrawn and in danger of being ignored by thinking man.
